I've realized that sometimes commits aren't clean. I mean, there are many things done, if only you take a look at diff you can see that they are done by making some changes, etc. I looked at some of my projects and I noticed that sometimes commit wasn't clean. There are many commits that haven't been made by me, but as a result they look like done by me. They have some of my stuff. Changes, etc. I'm curious is this a norm, how it should be done so that commits are clean all the time? A: The answer is on the question. You are making a commit of what you want to commit. Think of it as you are making a screenshot of the application at that point. The screenshot can be different from all previous versions of the application, and it can have some bugs, etc. Show HN: Type of Stack where you can see who else is using your site - sladen ===== gaius Is this a veiled accusation that these sites are insecure? ~~~ peterthehacker "I clearly did not want any malicious actors sharing my data with other interested parties." ~~~ gaius I didn't accuse you of

What's New In Photoshop CC 2019?

Photo: DPRReview Not really a review in the typical sense of the word. There are several reasons why the first image I had to share with the world are not really a review but more of a diary entry, a journal of sorts. You see, reading time has become somewhat of a scarce commodity lately. My days are filled with even more activities than before. "The Hollywood movie is out in a couple of days. What am I going to do?" - Now that is a question that has been asked ever since my first cinematic experience. With so much to do and so little time, I just have to pick what I can juggle and what is waiting for me. The one thing that was not going to be left behind for long was my computer. That was, of course, in my quest of cinematic greatness. I learned of this new product from a pretty good photography friend. I was convinced that this year it is finally going to happen! Dream House, the first of its kind and price bracket in the world, in my hands. After a quick roadtrip to get my hands on this new wonder of the world, I forgot all about my camera for the remainder of the week. Well, I honestly forgot for a few days in case I did not like what I saw. The second reason for me this was not a review is because DPRReview came out with an article on The Dream House, and it was not just any normal review, but it was very thorough. I liked the article, I have to say, it was well written and summarized everything. I am glad they featured this camera on this site and not one of their other sites. Don't expect much from the first thing I had to do with the camera in this review is the review of the battery. After a grueling day of shooting, one of the front panel lights went out. I had to be very careful with the way I handled it. A couple of minor scratches and a drop meant two days of downtime. Luckily, the price tag on the camera is very reasonable. I am guessing the battery took a hit on the shipping and handling. A fully charged battery can last at least three hours. I am not sure what the all day battery can do but it is never going to replace the trusty Olympus. Cameras in the same price
